

Motorcycle Helmets - U Never Run Out Of Decisions

Do you know what the pros and cons are to the countless styles of motorcycle helmets? They not only are manufactured with comfort in mind but also on their ability to shield your head and sometimes the face from injury. When thinking about one for your own use keep this in mind. Let us look at how these different helmets function.

One helmet that you will see that a lot of riders prefer is the full-face helmet. These are full coverage helmets they not only protect the whole head but the face too. So many of the accidents that happen with motorcycles involve the riders getting hurt in the facial area in fact it is reported it is 1/3 or more that do. That makes the fact that this helmet has extra safety for the face a huge point in its favor. There are mixed reviews about how the helmet feels on because of the added weight the safety features add though. Some of criticized it saying that it has played into neck getting injured. This has never been proven though as a cause for these neck injuries.

There is a helmet that is not up to par as far as safety is concerned that can still be legally used. It is called a half helmet. These helmet are more round shaped and resembles the open face helmets and they only provide some protections for the top of the head and gives none to the base of the head and the neck at the back. The face is not safe in these helmets. They also don't stay in place and shift on the head this is blamed on the shape.

Take the full-face helmet and remove the face protection and chin guard and you have what is known as the open face helmet. The one plus of this helmet is more range in vision but the minus is no facial security in safety inducing for the chin. Some of these open face helmets have the added capability of letting you add your own visor. Multiple numbers of riders enjoy using these helmets.

A helmet that goes over the not only the chin but over the entire face and head is the flip up helmet. The flip up helmets is as safe to use on a regular basis as the full-face helmet. The unique thing about this helmet is that you can flip up the face and chin guard when you need to access your face. This means if the rider wants to eat in a hurry without lifting his whole helmet off he can so this helmet does add convenience.

Motocross is a blast to do but does take some special protection for the rider. The motocross helmet provides just such protection. With a specially designed chin and visor area that takes a bashing that happens in a fall in motocross so that the face does not have to take a bashing. Also certain models of these helmets permit the use of goggles by the rider.

Now for the illegal use of motorcycle helmets there is the beanie helmet, which is mainly for show. They are lightweight and only cover the top of the head. They in no way meet the standards of the DOT or Snell for safety. The riders that want to fool the law into thinking that they are conforming to the laws so they are not ticketed usually wear these helmets. No one should be living so dangerously as to not protect themselves like this. These are not sanctioned for use as a safety device.

With such a large assortment of choices one should be able to purchase the perfect helmet for them. If you are having trouble deciding on which of the many motorcycle helmets to get think about where and how you do your motorcycling. Remember that you only have one head and brain so you definitely need to protect it. Ride on through life with safety.

About the Author

John Daniele is an expert on motorcycle helmets. For info or to purchase a handcrafted, light-weight, fiberglass novelty motorcycle helmets see www.helmetsrus.com To get 10% off your next purchase type in the coupon code: Video

Source: <http://www.free-articles.neutronmarketing.com>